Climate Connections

This course is an introductory earth science course that takes advantage of the surrounding natural landscape. Much of the course is focused on water because it is essential to life on earth and plays such a major role in shaping the landscape and how people live around the world. Students also study the cause of seasons, phases of the moon, soil, weather, the atmosphere, and the effect of human development on global climate. Frequent field trips allow students to delve deeper into many of these topics while exploring the local landscape.
